Read the following passage carefully:

THE VANISHING MOON

It was a fine, warm, starlit night. Darkness swallowed up the land, and ahead of them, behind them, to the left and to the right of them stretched nothing but water. Now and then the lights of a ship winked on the waves. Seabirds flew by, squawking in alarm at the sight of Firedrake.

Just after midnight, Sorrel suddenly gave a terrified shriek and bent over the dragon's neck. "Firedrake!" she called. "Firedrake! Have you seen the moon?"

"What about it?" asked the dragon. All this time his eyes had been fixed on the waves below, but now he looked up. What he saw made his wings feel as heavy as lead.

"What is it?" Ben leaned over Sorrel's shoulder in alarm.

"The moon," she cried frantically. "It's turning red."

Now Ben saw it, too. The moon was indeed taking on a tinge of coppery red. "What does it mean?" he asked, baffled.

"It means it'll disappear any moment now!" cried Sorrel. "There's going to be an eclipse of the moon! Now, of all times!" She gazed down at the crashing, foaming waves in terror.

Firedrake was flying more and more slowly, his wings beating as sluggishly as if invisible weights hung from them.

"You're flying too low, Firedrake!" called Sorrel.

"I can't help it!" the dragon called back to her wearily. "I'm as weak as a duckling, Sorrel!"

Firedrake dropped lower and lower. Ben could already taste the salty sea spray on his lips. And then, in the last red glow of light cast on the waves by the fading moon, he suddenly saw a chain of small islands rising from the sea in the distance. Strange islands they were, rising humpbacked from the water like half-submerged hills.

"Firedrake!" shouted Ben as loud as he could. "Look there, ahead of us! I can see islands. Try to land on one of them."

At that very moment the earth's dark shadow engulfed the moon. Firedrake plummeted from the sky like a bird winged by a shot, but the first of the strange islands was already below him. The dragon fell rather than landed on the island. His riders were almost wrenched from their straps. Ben realised he was trembling all over, and Sorrel wasn't doing much better. But Firedrake let himself sink to the ground with a sigh, folded his wings, and licked the salt water off his paws.
